They first make their appearance in April and May on the new growth of the Navel orange, reaching the first maximum of abundance about the time four-fifths of the petals are off. When most of the petals have fallen a few thrips pass to the more advanced fruit and the number feeding on the latter rapidly increases as the first growth of foliage becomes hardened and distasteful. The thrips continue feeding on the fruit until the latter, in turn, becomes somewhat tough, and reach a second FIG. 1.--Diagram Illustrating the relative abundance of orange thrips on oranges, on orange foliage, and on other plants during the season. (Original.) and greater maximum in May. June, and July. They then pass once more to the succulent growth which has come on in the meantime, and reach the third and final maximum of concentration in August...
