As my visit to England and Spain, were both unexpected, I was, consequently, a stranger in both countries; and I took the liberty of calling on Mr. Hackley, the American consul, for the purpose of consulting with him, on the best mode of reaching my place of destination. I found this worthy and intelligent officer, disposed to give me every facility in his power; and he insisted upon my lodging at his house, assuring me, at the same time, that, notwithstanding the extent and importance of Cadiz, a good hotel was not to be found in the place; and, that the only one which was tolerable, was the Quatro Nacionet, at that period filled with strangers. Such, Mr. Hackley observed, was the want of accommodation, that the supercargoes of vessels generally lodged in the houses of their consignees; and, that at one time, he had upwards of forty in family. Under such circumstances, I could not but accept the hospitable invitation; and my baggage was sent for from the packet. I seized upon the first opportunity to stroll through the city, and was particularly struck with its extreme cleanliness; the streets being neatly paved in the centre, and having flag-stones for side-walks. Cadiz may be said to be surrounded by the sea, in fact, it is built on an isthmus, which projects considerably towards the sea. There is a fine view from the westward. The air is mild and balsamic; and the...
