Not illustrated. 1908 Excerpt: .When the sky is palish-blue or milk-white, one feels inclined to suppose that the air is less transparent. On April 1, however, the sky was pale-blue and the air more transparent than on the preceding nights. It will not be difficult to find other similar instances. 40. If the meteorological elements we have recorded, have any effect upon the general brightness of the sky, it is not very striking. The number of data, however, is much too small to draw reliable conclusions. 12. The brightness of various portions of the sky. The mean brightness of different portions of the sky is given in table 8. The rotation numbers of the observed portions correspond with those of table 1 (the comparison-portions in heavy type). The following six columns contain the galactic latitude b , the azimuth A , the zenith-distance z , the logarithms of the relative and absolute brightness, and the total light-quantity pro square degree, expressed in terms of the light of a star of magnitude $t.o$ (H.S.). If the supposition is correct, that the illumination of the sky is only due to the direct light of telescopic stars, the ratios of the total quantities of starlight at different galactic latitudes would be immediately derivable from the relative brightness, corrected for extinction by the atmosphere. To test this supposition, we have reduced the observations, made on April 1 and 29 (except the numbers 80--84) The results arranged in order of the galactic latitude are given in the following...
